Frances Reed, pioneer of Bourke

Croker Prize entry 2022 – Theme: Where did I come from?

Frances Reed 1812-1895

Frances Reed was the matriarch of a large pioneer family that played a significant part in founding the town of Bourke in far-western NSW.

During her childhood in England, her Irish father Benjamin Heazle (a sergeant in the British Army) fought against Napoleon's forces at Merxham, the siege of Antwerp and the subsequent storming of Bergen op Zoom in March 1814¹. After he returned, the family lived an itinerant lifestyle in England (8 postings), Scotland (5), Ireland (3), Gibraltar and Malta². Nevertheless, Frances knew exactly where she had come from and passed on to her children and grandchildren that she had been born at Canterbury in 1812 and that her mother was Elizabeth Wilson³.

Margaret Ann Wilson (possibly an aunt or cousin) witnessed Frances' marriage to James Reed (a private in her father's regiment) at Monkwearmouth (Sunderland) on 28 June 1830⁴. The young couple was immediately posted to Kephallonia in the Ionian Sea². Upon their return to England, their first child was baptised William at Portsmouth on 24 April 1831⁵.

During the next five years the regiment had three postings each in England and Ireland². By the time the family embarked with the regiment for Australia aboard the Earl Grey in 1836⁶, two more sons had been born (John Benjamin⁶ and James⁷) but their brother William had died.

The Reeds served for seven years at Linden⁸, Windsor⁹, Illawarra⁹ and finally Sydney¹⁰ before the regiment was posted to India in 1843⁹, but Frances and James elected to settle permanently in Australia.

For the next two decades Frances raised their children in central Sydney while James worked as a grocer¹¹, a constable¹² and a labourer¹³. The family grew with the birth of Alexander (1837)⁸, Sarah (1839)¹⁴, Eliza Emily (1841)¹⁵, Sarah Ann (1844)¹⁶, Prudence (1846)¹², Frances (1848)¹³, George Charles (1851)³, Mary Ann (1852)¹⁷ and Jane (1856)³. Unfortunately, the first Sarah died in childhood. Frances and James may have eventually run a hotel or boarding house¹⁸.

By 1856 their son James had moved to Wellington in central NSW¹⁹ at the western edge of the nineteen counties that comprised the "limits of location." Permanent settlement outside these limits was not permitted until 1861 when government policy changed to allow selection and purchase of land in non-settled areas. Frances and her family decided to take advantage of the opportunities that this offered. After initially joining their son at Wellington, Frances and her husband journeyed by bullock wagon to Bourke, a further 420 kilometres north-west.

Bourke comprised just a few cabins, a goods depot and two pubs²⁰. Supplies came by wagon from Maitland (720 kilometres away) or by unreliable paddle-steamer from Adelaide (about 3,000 kilometres by river). Immediately on arrival, Frances had to call on her life experience and resourcefulness in assisting at the birth of William Wright in November 1862, just the eighth birth recorded in the district²¹.

Despite her worldly background Frances faced significant new tribulations in this hot, dry, dusty and very isolated fledgling town. There were very few women²² but plenty of wild men. Even the newly arrived policemen were erratic, with Constable Elliott having shot and killed Sergeant Webb a year earlier²³.

She had wisely left her younger children in the care of their older siblings in Sydney and Wellington. Nevertheless, soon after 19-year-old Sarah Ann married Michel Brennan in Sydney on 8 January 1863, she and her husband brought the rest of the family to Bourke¹⁷.

Frances purchased land on the corner of Darling and Glen Streets on 18 December 1863²⁴ and her husband bought three adjacent blocks a year later²⁵. They also selected eighty acres of land at Oxley's Tableland (40 kilometres from Bourke)²⁶ where they built a successful hotel called the Mountain House²⁷. Frances soon earned a reputation as a good hostess and was lauded for her clever technique of preserving butter (by burying it)²⁸ while James earned plaudits for his ability to source fodder for guests' horses and bullocks during times of drought²⁹.

She was a member of the Anglican Church and provided supper for the congregation after the opening of the new church on 26 August 1874³⁰.

Nevertheless, the challenges of the frontier lifestyle continued for many years. In 1871 bushrangers took refreshment at the Reed's Mountain House hotel unaware that they were being surrounded by a party of police who had tracked them from the Murrumbidgee District.

They were captured when they emerged³¹. Seven years later, constable James Murphy (Frances' son-in-law) was severely bashed with a stirrup iron by bushranger Captain Midnight³², who later died from wounds received in a gunfight with Bourke police while trying to again elude capture³³.

There were also the regular difficulties posed by droughts, dust storms, heat waves, floods and economic recessions. The 1890 flood was a particular trial for Frances, now 78 years old. The town was inundated and she and hundreds of others had to live in tents on higher land at North Bourke for months before returning to a town now coated with stinking, disease-ridden mud³⁴.

Frances died five years later³. She had endured much tragedy during her lifetime. Her younger brother James died during an epidemic in Malta in 1824³⁵; she buried two of her own infant children; and seventeen grandchildren pre-deceased her. Perhaps the bitterest blows were the drowning of her 7-year-old grandson William John Reed in the Darling River at Bourke on 7 October 1865³⁶ and the death of his only sibling, 15-year-old Frances Eliza Reed, when her clothes caught alight at Bourke on 8 July 1875³⁷. Their broken-hearted parents (John Benjamin Reed and Eliza nee Green) both died within five years³⁸.

Despite these sorrows, Frances' life story is one of a resilient and resourceful woman whose initiative and enterprise helped to forge a better life for her ten adult children and ninety-one grandchildren. She was one of a few strong, brave women who helped found the town of Bourke. Her descendants (including the Brennan, Farrell, Gibb, Johnson, Maxwell, Murphy and Whye families) honoured her with a prominent memorial stone in Bourke cemetery.
